I really don't think my ears should be dripping blood like that.

My arms are as unstable as a relationship between a pit bull and a cute baby. I would be thankful if my vision was just double instead of the current fractal landscape I look upon. And judging by the splotches on the ground, I am bleeding from more than just one orifice. Sirens are blaring around me, there is a thick layer of smoke everywhere, flames stroking the walls. And figures are running around and I wish I could call them people, but some have four arms, some tentacles instead, and some look like they are floating, but at this point I think my eyes just might be irreversibly damaged.

Where am I? How did I get here?

A beaked creature runs up to me, wrapped in a heavy, tattered green cloak. It screams unintelligible gibberish at me. I try to look into its eyes, eyes that have no pupils and seem to have a slight inner sheen, looking like a cheap garden lamp. It turns around and shrieks at something behind it. Presumably, something explodes, because everything shakes and a loud reverberating noise mutes everything. The creature starts running, but I grab onto what I think is a foot of some kind.

"Please... help..." I manage to gurgle out.

The creature whips around its massive eyes, and the equally enormous eyebrows dance across its forehead. It points towards something in the ceiling, but even if my eyes could focus I doubt it could see anything behind clouds and pillars of fire and smoke.

I try to get up on one knee, but I slip down. I try to get up again, but once again I just slip. I seem to have lost control of most of my body.

A tall, dark gray figure walks up surprisingly relaxed. It utters words that have no meaning but I can still feel that they are as zen-like as a well-rested guru's at a million-dollar retreat. It flashes what can only be classified as a serial murderers smile, and the beaked creature tosses me up on its back and starts running. Every step feels like the equivalent of missing a nail and hitting your thumb with the hammer, except the hammer is the size of a person and the thumb is every single nerve in my body.

I have trained for years to not collapse and not go unconscious. A second of inattention could be your death. Yeah, I have trained a lot for this. For this...?

"That shouldn't dip below 60 like that, should it?"

"No, adjusting the coolant rate."

The cockpit was cramped. In order to make the voyage possible, there had been an incessantly increasing number of requirements on what should be visible to the pilot. As a result, flying in The Vanguard was an ill-fitting job for me. I fit, technically, but it was a constant strain like posing for a bad artist in a dynamic way.

"Is the speed okay? It looks okay from here.", I said.

"You're still gaining, that's fine, that's expected.", I heard back from the control center. Primary communication was resident Carter, who, although not yet graduated and thus with a proper title, was superbly gifted and could read all the charts and numbers faster than anyone else. He had and would probably never be on a date in his entire life, actually I sometimes doubted he had even spoken to another human directly and not through a computer, but by God did I trust his readings.

"Check on the starboard valves, Rito," said a third voice, coming from Dr. Hasseln. "They seem to be off by a few degrees."

"They're fine," I said. I looked at the screens. They seemed fine, or if they were off, Carter would notice before me. Not that I had that much control over them, anything that required fine-tuned maneuvers at this speed was generally handled by the primary unit.

"We are ready for drive to be activated in two minutes, we need the angles corrected, you still have too much yaw," Carter said.

"I think aiming at this point worked best in the simulations," I said.

"No, your W is off, it's too high."

I lowered the sensitivity as much as possible and did the most minute possible adjustment. The third decimal in one number in a quaternion somewhere changed.

Carter noticed immediately and said: "That's better."

The idea behind the drive, named Rudra after some deity some Indian guy on the team had figurines off and although I had heard the god was a man the depictions I saw from that guy was always female and also very scantily clad, was to do something like pull molecules together and then propel something using the strong force or something like that. The way I understood it was that I was going to be turned into a rail gun bullet, except thousands of times stronger than by using electromagnetism, and the primary role of the ship was just to keep me alive during that jump. Although I had sat through hundreds of hours of lectures on how it works, really, I had just focused on training myself for the role. Perfectly controlling the ship and your body.

"Just like doing a perfect squat," I quietly said to myself as adjusted the control in my hand slightly.

I used to drive a motorcycle for a living. I did trials and I did racing. Then by sheer coincidence someone I knew happened to work in astrophysics, and their newest project required an astronaut of outstanding skill. It was hellish training, but I got to ride the most expensive and delicate vehicles in the world, and the thrill of being the best at that was worth all the droning on about math.

"Activating in thirty seconds", said Carter and I ran my eyes across four different screens. Everything looked like it did in the simulations where this succeeded.

"Dash to last four and a half seconds seconds. Estimated landing is in stable orbit around the moon. Expected distance is 299 800 kilometers," Dr. Hasseln rattled, mostly to keep it documented and less to inform us.

"Clean and steady here," I said, for similar reasons.

"T minus ten," Dr. Hasseln said.

I could see on all the monitors how Carter locked in and adjusted and changed values at blinding speed.

"Hey, Carter," I said surprisingly calm. Looking at my vitals I was doing great at not panicking.

"Yeah?"

"We're the best," I said.

"Not yet I don't think," he said with absolutely no sense of either humor nor hubris.

I took a few deep breaths and readied everything I could from within the cockpit.

"Engaging," Carter said.

And suddenly I cracked in half. I had broken bones before, this wasn't that. It felt like half of me suddenly didn't exist anymore. Like the part of space that used to contain the lower part of me and also the ship had moved somewhere else temporarily like a toilet being renovated and I had to go up a staircase to get them. Except I had no legs.

Saying that I heard a crack would be wrong. There was no sound here. It was something that echoed in what I would call a soul if I thought I had one. I felt a suction on my entire body, it was getting squeezed through the eye of a needle even though I was rich enough to know I could not make that. My eyes had fallen out a long time ago, the air had solidified and could not pass into my lungs nor could I spit it out of my mouth, like I was choking on an over sized ball gag made of stale air. My bones, nerves, sinews and flesh had all separated neatly, they felt like they were being packed by an overly neurotic elderly man and were all in their own compartments of a bag.

And suddenly I don't think I existed anymore.

The beaked creature threw me onto the floor, and if I still had neurons left to tell me to feel pain that weren't already working overtime at doing that, I would have flinched even harder. Calling what my eyes sent to my brain "seeing" was being more generous than a scandalous bureaucrat to a PR-firm, but I think I saw several more creatures rummaging about. I tried to take in the environment, but it was mostly metal and even more mostly dark. I wheezed and coughed and breaths more aptly bubbled than flowed through my lungs. The floor started shaking again. In what could just as reasonably be a vision at death, I saw something move in the corner, and I raised my hand gently towards it. It came closer. All my senses were so muddled I couldn't tell what it was, except I felt what I believed was hair brush against my face. It picked me up and slowly dragged me in a direction.

"Tha... nks..."

I heard some sounds from it. I can only assume it told me I was dead, because that is what I would have told me. When I was lifted up, I got the first view of my body. I couldn't get up because I was missing a leg. There was enough blood all over my torso that I couldn't perfectly tell, but I think some parts that are supposed to be inside of it was outside. My suit, a marvel of engineering, was more like my personal coffin at this point, at best keeping everything from spilling out.

I was walked through several doors, and eventually was lifted up on a slab. I would have assumed for cremation.

I tilted my head, and for a brief second, through the blood and dizziness, I saw the face of a cute girl.

What a nice way to go, I thought as I went unconscious.

Baom, baom, baom.

That's a really annoying pounding.

Baom, baom, baom.

It echoes through everything.

Baom, baom, baom.

It's the sound of a neighbor who starts building his newly-bought furniture at six in the morning on a Saturday. Clumsy and insecure of how much force to use, hitting every nail fifteen times instead of a steady two.

I try to open my eyes but there's resistance. There's something on my eyelids. I bring up my hand to wipe it away, there's a thick layer of some sort of goop on my eyes. With a hand practiced by many hours in the shower, I get enough of the slime off so I can blink open my eyes. My hand has almost no feeling, but once I can see I realize that's because it's practically in a glove of what I can only call bandages, even though it looks more like a student art project made out of potato peel.

I try to sit up, but I move with the grace of a 450 lb woman. I can only hope my muscles have been torn or damaged and not actually ripped out of my body. After an embarrassingly unsteady and slow rise to sitting up, I get a view of the damage.

Baom, baom, baom.

I am missing my left leg from roughly halfway down the thigh. The stump is encapsulated in the same potato-like substance as my hand. My right leg is surprisingly fine, even though from what I can see of my toes through the goop on them they are not facing the correct ways.

I can squeeze my left hand, barely, but a few of my fingers won't obey my commands. The right one is much worse off, I would be skeptical to calling it a hand at all, and any movement at all reminds me off the time I was prisoner in a replication of the Stanford prison experiment. I doubt even years of surgery could get that thing working again. Whatever this mush they've slathered me with is, it does a great job of coagulating the blood and stopping me from bleeding out, and its pain relieving strength must match or even outpace that of morphine, but it doesn't seem like the kind of magical cure that turns jam back into strawberries.

Baom, baom, baom.

With willpower and resilience that I believe would earn Olympic medals back home I manage to turn my head enough to get a bearing on the sounds. They are coming from what I assume is a deck above me, if I assume right that I am on some sort of craft. Other than the sounds of someone thwacking a disobedient machine, I hear very little. The room must have soundproofing equal to that of what a teenager wishes his parents basement had.

I look around for something to use as a crutch. The room is probably a medical bay, with a few slabs and plenty of storage space for what's most likely a variety of necessities.

I rotate my body and try to plant my foot on the ground as light as the morning dew on a spring leaf. Instead I immediately cringe from a pain shock, and also the goop, while sticky to get off, is slippery to stand on. I manage to just barely keep my body leaning against the bunk I just tried to get off of, and I spend what feels like the next ten minutes getting up on it again.

"Fucking ballet dancer right here, folks," I said sardonically to an imagined audience, with a crackly and hoarse voice.

A few deep breaths, now my head pounding in symphony with the distant hammering, but before I gather enough strength to do anything the door opens. As it opens, a barrage of noise also floods in, with everything from the hammering to what sounds like water leaking and people running and metal screaming.

A woman enters, and she gives me a quick look before going over to what is some sort of cupboard she starts rummaging in. As the door closes, all the sounds stop again. Really good sound insulation. I once again manage to muscle myself into a sitting position so I can get a look at her.

She has long, blonde, braided pigtails, and is roughly as tall as I am, which sadly isn't much to brag about as part of why I was chosen for this was my slightly short stature. She is wearing some sort of black, patchy overalls. She turns around and apparently didn't hear me sitting up, because she jumps a bit with surprise. Then she opens her mouth.

"Hzza gti hoo ra llteemiia os," she says, or something like that.

"I, uh..." I sputter.

She walks around me and looks at my legs. I realize I am mostly naked, my suit nowhere to be seen. State of the art, that thing. Hope they didn't throw it away.

"Emgo taas," she says while getting a jar of something.

"Whe... where am I?" I manage to say, a bit proud over the achievement since, looking at my chest, my ribs and lungs are seemingly mostly vacated from my body. "Where's my suit?"

She replies with another string of sounds, and it looks like she nods her head towards some locker in the corner of the room. She picks up another object that looks like a tool of some sort, and starts heading for the door again.

"Wait! Wait!"

She stops and turns around.

"Wait, do you... can you understand me?"

"Tza."

"Do you... could you... could you nod," I point at my head and nod to show what I mean, "could you nod if you understand me?"

She nods at me. Oh, so she has taken English classes and I missed out on whatever language she is speaking. It doesn't sound anything like I've heard on Earth.

"Do you... can you... could you hand me a pair of crutches?"

You'd miss it if you blinked, but she seems to frown for a second. Then she puts down the jar and the tool, goes over to some storage closet in the wall, opens it and pulls out something, tosses it towards me, says some words and then leave with the things she found earlier into the cacophony beyond the door.

I look at what she threw over here. It's a pair of mechanical appendages, looks like they would clamp onto your arms or legs. They are on the floor, which I found to be pretty rude of her to leave them so out of reach for me, but I take a deep breath, plant my foot and slowly lower myself down so I'm crawling on, well, all three. I go up to the things, look for some sort of on-switch, and predictably don't find it. I realize how hard it is to sit with one leg missing, so my otherwise flawless lotus position is lopsided and clumsy. I try to get my arm into what looks like a kind of brace, and the machine snaps onto my arm. It doesn't hurt, luckily enough. I lose my balance a bit and try to put my now cyborg-arm down to brace, but it never reaches the floor. Instead it seems to propel itself upwards to stabilize me. I manage to wrestle the other one on as well, and as they both start to hum slightly, I feel almost weightless. I'm thinking I want to push off the floor, but it looks more like a gesture than an action, because before I reach it with my hands, my body is lifted up by some sort of propulsion from the machines.

I stand up, and there is almost no weight at all on my right foot. The machines are hovering my body so I feel like in a nearly zero-G environment. I start to limp towards the door. Even with the appendages removing almost all feel of gravity from my body, every step drives needles beneath every nail, pulls every hair, twists every pore. Even with this much apparent pain killing going on, I can't help but tear up.

I step through the door, and the serenity that was in the medical bay is eradicated. I seem to be on board some sort of ship, and it is crashing and burning. I slowly move towards the source of the loudest noises and those that sound like they would be made by humans. Or whatever is on board this thing.

I reach what must be the control room, and it is in chaos. The woman is frantically trying to maneuver or something, and the beaked creature from earlier that, I assume, dragged me onto this ship is running around trying to keep the hull around us from collapsing. There is buckling and crankling, there is a thin layer of smoke although I currently can't see anything on fire, and the monitors, to the extent I can understand them, give roughly as many warnings as they have space to do so. On the ground are several human-like corpses, but also the remains of either one large or several small robots. I see a tall shadow sitting seemingly relaxed on a bench near the edge of the room, but I don't give it anymore notice.

I stumble up to the controls, and the woman turns to me and screams something at me. Well, isn't that typical. I ignore her and try to understand what I'm looking at. From what I can tell, we are being chased by a ship, whatever defenses we have are long since down, and it is a miracle we still have gravity and air. It also looks like we are just drifting along by momentum and not actively riding.

The woman is seated and interacting with what looks like the manual controllers for the ship. Although I don't understand a word she's saying, I recognize the kind of flustered, unsure movements of someone who wants to do something but is unsure of what exactly to do. There is only one chair with controllers, and I huddle over.

"Move."

She looks at me with what I take to be annoyance, and continues talking loudly. I recognize the hints of panic even through the language barrier.

"Move!"

I give her a shove that is pathetically light since I can't generate any kind of force, and although she hisses, she gets up. I plop down with extreme care, and the relief of sitting down almost zones me out. I had ignored just how much it hurt just to stand up.

I snap back into it. I look at all monitors, study the controls, and is pleasantly surprised that this seems to be built for someone roughly human. I was afraid I would need four extra mechanical arms or legs made of tentacles to steer it.

The beaked creature shouts something and starts to operate something over in its corner. I take notice of what is changing on the screens, and my guess is that the creature is controlling a turret of some sort and firing back at the ship chasing us. Our ship shakes violently, and the new signs that popped up indicates that we were hit by something.

I fight with the controls, and with everything being in some bizarre not only foreign but actively alien language, the feedback isn't all that useful, but I've felt this so many times before, an unknown machine, giving predictable outputs if you can figure out the inputs, the struggle between the mechanical beast-like power of an engine running on a nuclear reactor, and the gentle touch of a lever from a man who has practiced to be able to differentiate down to the denier between materials.

"Come on, girl, work with me here..." I say while experiencing the equivalent of a beginner stall, working the so-to-say clutch with the grace of a virgin on a clitoris.

As I get to grasp with the controls, the engines start working with me rather than against themselves, and we can start to try to dodge the incoming fire.

Every swerve is less graceful than I would like to admit, every acceleration brutish. But there are several shots that would have hit us had I not made them, and the beaked creature is returning fire well. I've no idea what weapons either we or they have, but they are no doubt effective. The creature screams what I can only take to be a war cry, and the screens show the pursuer lighting up in a glorious fireball.

"Woo yaa!", I scream out at the light show, which my body immediately reminds me not to do by cramping up at the straining of the muscles. My mouth fills with blood, but I manage to not spew it all over the place.

There is a reason you don't cheer before you have cleared the posts. The second I am preoccupied with keeping down the blood and clutching my stomach, a final projectile emerges from the fireball that used to be their ship, and it hits us. The engine is taken out entirely, and simultaneously the artificial gravity on board stops, there is a sudden pressure differential and we start spinning with no way to counteract it. I cling to the chair best I can, the others get tossed around the room and try to find something to hold on to.

While that was a fun ride, I am now flying uncontrollably through space, with barely any air left, being screamed at in alien languages, bleeding pouring out of me from all possible places, pain tearing at me, and before I completely pass out and pass on, I see something weird on one of the few monitors remaining.

Space is big. Really big. So what are the chances that we would be on a direct collision course with another ship?

Everything fades to black and my ears fill with the orchestral soundtrack of the entire ship crashing into a wall.

I'm getting kinda tired of waking up with no idea what's happening.

The dreams I had were vivid. They weren't only about my girlfriend, although she starred frequently, and most often naked. There was the ones about riding motorcycles on the coastline while looking at the sunset, and I am always glad when I have that feeling, even in dreams. And of course I had ones about weird alien creatures, although they tended to look more like they do in the movies rather than the brief glimpses I had had of them so far in what I had hoped was only some sort of super-dream.

But waking up, once again in a place clearly not on Earth, nor on any of our space stations, I was apparently refused the luxury of just dreaming about my own death and dismemberment, I had to live through it instead.

I look around, and I am in some sort of capsule. The capsule seems to respond to mental state, because once I woke up it immediately started to move. A swarm of various arms sprouted from it, and they started to disconnect masks and stabilizers and what have you's from me. As I felt the last one being removed, I kept still. Then I braced for pain as I prepared to sit up.

And I felt nothing. Actually, no, I felt great. But I wasn't quite feeling like I use to. I feel like I'm slipping a bit with my grip, there was something...

Oh.

"My hand is metal," I tell it as if to reinforce the reality.

I hold it in front of my face, and I can feel my heart race. My right hand is now a purely mechanical thing, going down to about halfway down my wrist where I once again turn organic. It responds like my old hand used to, but off. A bit slower? A bit less precise?

I recognize the ill-boding feeling is more places, and with a jerk I am in a sitting position.

My left leg. Large parts of my torso. About a square inch of my stomach. Mechanical implements all over.

I feel with my left hand on face and around my head, but it feels normal, although bruised and beaten.

I am also naked. This time I don't even have the decency of a pair of underwear like last time.

I get off the slab, and place my now metallic foot on the ground. It's stable. I don't slip and glide, I don't feel any pain putting some weight onto it. I am completely alone in the room, although the way some other capsules are open, the others just woke up before me.

I look around for some clothes, and the closest thing I find is a sheet. I wrap it around me like a cheap toga you'd get for five bucks for a cheap Halloween-party. I am starving. By my biological clock, I feel like I've slept forever, but I'm not notably malnourished. I inspect the capsule, and I imagine one of the dozens of meters and gauges on it is for food and water, I wouldn't know which ones.

As I walk towards the door, this time actually with a straight back and not sputtering, I pass by a small mirror. My face looks like I've pissed off three Irishmen the night before, and my hair, usually a nice dark blonde with just enough length to have some bangs, is now uniformly a mess, with patches burnt off, others torn apart and a few that miraculously survived all crashes and thus are now instead too long. The length means I must have been out for over a week, probably bordering on two.

"But you're still a handsome devil," I said and made finger guns at myself in the mirror. Which made me see the metal hand as well. My smile died down a bit. Then I looked down on the metal hand, which seemed more intricate than even the most expensive robotics project I've seen back home, and it obeyed my will perfectly. And the smile returned.

Suddenly, I heard a loud voice from behind me.

"-''-α -|||__" it "said".

I couldn't even make out a single syllable. I turned around and a massive green mouth, a minimum of five feet across, was talking in midair.

I hoped it wasn't actually a large flying mouth but instead a hologram. Especially since it was cartoonish in proportions and mimicry, large exaggerated movements.

"Excuse me, are you talking to me?", I said towards the mouth.

"-__### #-^'' _-_-α" it said and burst into a gigantic smile.

"You're not making a lot of sense," I said.

The mouth made some gestures, equally extreme, first of bewilderment, then pouting.

""_" it said and the door opened. I assumed the two were connected and walked through the door. Once through, the mouth kept talking, and a line of lights were on the floor. I followed them through a corridor with an industrial feeling, pipes and cables going across the walls, until I arrived at another door which opened up in front of me.

I stepped out into a well-lit room that was, for being a cockpit of a vessel, tasteful and pleasant to be in. A chair came rolling up to me, but I felt good and wanted to stretch a bit, so I kept standing.

"_- α'-" the voice said, sounding a bit mad. The chair spun around and then crept slightly closer.

"Alright, dude, relax," I said and sat down in it. As soon as I did, talons came out from the chair and gripped me. I tried to spring out, but they were instantaneous. A small hatch opened, and a minimal robot rolled out and started to head towards me.

"Don't you fucking dare, get that away from me...!" I screamed while trying to get out of the chair. The thing came up to the chair and somehow started rolling up its side. It came up to my face.

"Get away from me, you piece of...!" I said as it started spraying dust in my face. It went all around it, covering my head completely. "Fuck did you do, robo-" I couldn't finish my sentence before my ears and throat and the inside of my eyeballs all felt extremely hot, like I was being ignited from within my skull. I gasped and screamed, but suddenly, through my own noise, I could hear something.

"... least ya could do, yano, there's quite some damage and..." The mouth stopped speaking as it noticed I stopped screaming. It said: "Oh, goodie, can ya understand me now?"

"Huh? Ye-yeah." I said, completely failing to hide my surprise and equally failing to not drool and moan.

"Goodie goodie, I get the others down so we can all talk, yano," the mouth said.

"Who... what... what did you do?" I asked, my entire head still throbbing from pain and my internal temperature feeling like it can boil an egg.

"Ya some primitive who hasn't been induced in the commsfield, 'parently, so I hadda douse ya with it. But better be still for it, yano, so I made ya sit in the chair first, can be nasty afterwards," the mouth beamed and the chair released its grip from me.

"The... what? Commsfield?" I asked.

The mouth pursed its lips and then slid back into a smile. "Well, we waiting for the others, yano, I mise well fill ya in. The commsfield is a swarm of adaptive particles that all in contact with each other, and they infect the mental faculties, yano, the brains, of any organism it gets in contact with. They learn the languages that is in that brain, and the entire field adapts to it."

"And I'm now... infected?"

"Don't ya worry, there's no side 'fects," the mouth said with the uncaring smile of a pharmacy sales rep.

I was a bit taken aback, but then I finally processed what it had told me. I said: "Wait, wait, you said 'learn'. But you could understand me before, right, I think? So it already knew English?"

"Ya, your language is already in the field," the mouth said.

"How...?" I said.

The mouth, seemingly not very interested since the motion were now less over-exaggerated, said: "Obvisly, someone with ya language already been."

I was too shocked to act smart, and also with the dull undertone of a migraine passing from the dust earlier, and just asked the obvious questions: "There... aliens have made contact with Earth?"

"Erf? Never hearda it. I canna lookie," the mouth said and started to make the tried and true motions of pretending to think really hard, biting your lip and sucking on your teeth. "Ya also call it 'Tellus'? Quita lot of primitives call planets 'dirt'. Or 'water', in some cases."

I ignored the crude snipe and said: "I think that's old Greek. What about it?"

Alongside the mouth now appeared an image that was, unmistakably, of the Earth, along with what I assumed was some sort of encyclopedic entry for it. The mouth said: "Is a class three planet. Is been in the field before."

I tried to read the text, but the glyphs were alien beyond reproach. I signed and said: "What does class three mean?"

The mouth took away the image and text and said: "The planet been visited and charted by The Jiktar, they probably had people on the surface, but no open contact."

Talking more to myself and less to the hologram, I said: "Aliens have been on Earth..."

As I said that, a door opened and the woman arrived. Her face looked bitter. Behind her came the beaked creature.

"I still don't agree with your terms," the beaked creature said. The voice was crackly and eerie, like every word was being spoken by a ghost on a radio.

I could now get a good look at what the creature actually was. He was clad in a heavy green cloak, covering the entire body, and it looked like a head sticking out from a sack of potatoes, if the sack now weighed over 200 pounds. The creature was either a blob, or it hunched over to the extent of almost folding itself. The beak was flat and long, and when he spoke, you could see the flashes of sharp teeth along the rims. His eyes were a matte white, and with no pupil, it was hard to see where he had his focus, if he had any at all. Starting at the top and going down the back of its head was a ridge of slight spiky protrusions. He stood only about a meter tall, but sometimes when he moved you could see shadows of bent knees and elbows, so it was probably taller if it stood up properly.

The mouth just turned into an ever wider smile and said: "Ya will."

I looked over at the woman. She looked human, but there was something just slightly off. I couldn't say what, people come in all shapes and sizes, but this one was different. More chairs rolled out into the floor, but she ignored them and went to sit on what looked like some sort of bench instead, while the creature remained standing. He looked over to me.

"Thanks," he said, sounding like a cassette tape replayed a million times.

I didn't understand, but luckily my confusion was interrupted by two more doors opening on the opposite side of the room the woman and creature had entered by. Two men, creatures, beings, competing to be the tallest, entered.

One of them were the dark gray one I had seen glimpses of earlier. He was slightly hunched over, but he was still generously almost six and a half feet tall. He seemed to be immensely weighed down by a lock around his wrists, a bulging chrome-like lock that sealed his entire forearms and most of his hands as well. I imagine it must be really heavy to make the entire creature lean forward like that. He was dressed in some really shabby, torn light gray clothes, there were more holes than garment, but even with the weight and the shackles and the clothing, for some reason, the creature was smiling. And I got the impression more of a shark showing teeth than happiness from it.

The other creature was at least seven feet tall, and it stood fully erect. The top of the head nearly touched the ceiling. The skin was an almost disgusting pale gray. He had a large, purple cape that covered the entire body, but when he moved his hands they came out from almost near the bottom of it. It appeared to be a creature that could grasp its own ankles even when standing straight up, which I would be impressed by from a petite yogi but mostly weirded out by here. Most eye-catching was the face, though: it was thin and had sharp lines and looked more like the sole of a shoe than a real face, and it was completely bald. On his forehead, he had something that at first glance looked like a marking, but when he moved you realized was some sort of jewelry or something like that pressed into its skin.

The tall, pale being got seated, the dark gray one leaned towards a wall and the beaked one continued standing, or perhaps it's sitting, it was hard to tell. The mouth must have considered that good enough, since it started speaking.

"Hi hello, prisoners and slaves. What can ya offer me to not kill ya?"

Personally, I wanted to cut through the silence by telling the voice to go fuck itself, but I also realized that I have no idea where I am or just how capable this thing is of killing me. Silence was the prudent option. Everyone else seemed to agree.

The floating mouth did some teasing motions, but then settled down and said: "Ya crashed ya ship into mine. Did a lotta damage. I need to be paid back. And there is the medical costs, yano. Some needed more than others, but even though I helped ya before asking, I'm no altruist."

A list appeared as a hologram beside the mouth, and although I couldn't read it, the structure was easy enough to see: a bill. Item, cost, item, cost, item, cost.

The list scrolled, and the mouth provided commentary. "And there be, yano, the cost of admission as well. It's not free to fly on my ship," it said.

The dark gray one laughed. "I do not believe this is your ship," he said.

The mouth, to the extent a six-by-six-foot-holographic-mouth can, turned towards him. It said: "How ya mean?"

He was still smiling. He said: "This is a Jiktart ship, and it is not hard to figure out that you are not a Jiktart captain."

The mouth laughed with a sound like a buzz saw catching a metal pipe. It said: "True. This used to be Jiktart. But now, it my ship. Ya would know."

I felt like I should get it to skip to the chase. "I don't have anything to pay you back with, sweet tooth," I said.

"None of us do," the beaked creature said.

"No," said the tall, pale one. I can swear the voice reverberated, even in the completely echo-free room we were in. It almost sounded like the voice shivered, it didn't really want to come out. Gave me goosebumps. "Do you require someone liberated from life? If we can establish a contract, Ecktohl can assist you," he said, and Ecktohl was either his name or his race, I'm guessing.

The mouth did a real toothy smile and said: "That's the kinda guy I like. Ya might not have tings for me. But ya can do work. Work to get tings."

"To get what?" I said.

"Tings. Stuff, objects, matter," it said.

"Oh," I said.

"These men won't help you," a female voice said. I turned around towards the woman, who was almost scowling by now. "They are trash and scum, they steal and ravage, not a single one of them will keep their words to you," she said, and although the words were harsh, she was sweating bullets. She must have thought her disgust towards us was stronger than her safety, whatever reason she had for that, I mean, I'm a pretty swell guy, I've done no one no harm.

The dark gray man laughed heartily. The beaked creature and the pale, tall man both just looked at her. The mouth did a large and loud "Ooooooh!"

"What makes ya say that, girlie?" the mouth said, shifting the hologram towards the bench she sat on.

"Do you know what these people are?" she said. Both her voice and her breathing intensified. She was kinda cute this worked up.

The mouth emitted a small chuckle. It's kinda weird to see a mouth pretend to make a sound you make entirely with your throat.

"I'm assuming they come from the prison that was attacked just before your ship crashed into mine. Ya have been here for almost ten days, yet none of ya have really spoken to each other. Ya on a burning ship with corpses on it and ya all strangers? Not really subtle."

"Yes!" said the woman and stood up. "The prison in the Kuutellar belt was attacked, and these men fled from it, taking a Jiktat ship and trying to escape with it, and..." she was interrupted by the mouth.

"That's exactly why I can bargain, girlie," it said. "Ya the kind of people don't consider something off the table just because it forbidden."

"I'm not!" she said, exasperated.

"Maybe ya ain't. I'll get them to pay for ya too. They gentleman, yano. Right?" it said and turned towards us.

The dark man laughed. The beaked one made some scratching noise I had no idea what it meant.

"Here the deal," the mouth said with a sudden seriousness to it. "I require parts to fix my ship, and then there be the other costs as well, which ya also pay with tings I want. Ya can go back to ya quarters now, I call on ya when it time to get my tings. Anyone not want part of deal, ya can deal with space on ya own."

That's a better deal for me than I would have expected, and the others seemed to think likewise. Deal with hell when it comes.

The mouth seemed pleased with the meeting and the hologram disappeared. The pale and the dark man both went out the ways they came, the dark one never once ceasing to smiling and silently laugh to himself. The woman stormed out the door she came from, and the beaked creature hung around but was looking out what I wasn't sure if it was a window or just a really well-made screen showing the star field outside the ship.

"Did you fix me up with these and save me?" I said and held up the mechanical hand. I wasn't really sure where to point it to get the attention of the mouth.

"That me. My ship has very good medical facilities," the mouth said and appeared again next to me.

I thought that this should be done in the right order and said: "Before that, sorry, do you have a name?"

The mouth said: "I'm Ghizzo."

"And, Ghizzo... what are you?" I said. "Are you an AI? Are you the ship's comput..." Ghizzo clearly had a reaction to that, and I stopped speaking mid-sentence. It had furled its lips.

"I'm not a crude set of instructions. I'm not this ship, I own this ship," it said, apparently having taken offense.

"So what are you?" I asked, with an emphasis on "are".

"I'm... many primitives won't know, your language might not help you. I'm a sentient electric cloud," Ghizzo said. And although I technically know what every one of those words mean, I feel like a toddler being shown a magic trick, I was too stupid to even know I was being fooled.

"I... Are you fucking with me?" I said.

"I'm not, as ya put it, fucking with ya," Ghizzo said, and with that the mouth disappeared, and I felt a presence on top of me. My hair suddenly stood up, a slight warmth moved along my arm, and my right foot started involuntarily twitching. It started speaking again, now the voice coming from nowhere: "I'm a cloud of currents, like the ones in ya brain. I control this ship by running current through the circuits, I have since long killed the AI that used to be the first mate." A man appeared in front me, a perfect image, if I didn't know Ghizzo did holograms I would think someone teleported in. So the mouth Ghizzo usually appeared as was a gaudy color and unrealistic by choice, it can project anything and in perfect detail. It said, and the voice came from the man with utmost precision: "Would ya prefer I take the shape of something ya can recognize?"

I was starting to understand this Ghizzo. If I ignore what it says and think of it as a rogue AI that controls the ship, I can understand its form, and if I think of what it has done, which, based on the clues dropped, is take over a military vessel and kill everyone and everything on board, it's clearly deranged.

I said: "Go back to being a fucking mouth or a billboard or whatever you want." A laughter bellowed through the room, and the man disappeared and the mouth, this time purple and extremely female but slightly smaller at perhaps just three feet across, once more floated around near the monitor.

"So you fixed up my wounds and also gave me new limbs. Why?" I asked, and while I certainly wasn't ungrateful, it was weird for someone to finance the world's most expensive operation on a total stranger. Unless, as I now suspected, he wanted to work me to the bone to pay these things off.

Ghizzo, as the floating mouth, took on a charming smile and said: "I'm a kind soul. I help everyone. And in return, ya help me." As expected. This was gonna cost more than just the proverbial arm and a leg.

"Just tell me what you need when you need it, sugar plum," I said and got up from the chair. Ghizzo chuckled and the hologram disappeared, although I'm certain the entire ship was full of microphones and cameras and sensors, and had I worn a watch every single tick of its hands would have been noticed by that stalker. I went over to the beaked creature as I noticed it was still looking out the window-like thing. It was a beautiful view, giving me the same feeling as looking into the eyes of a girl much too young for me to have a chance with as I lean in to kiss her.

"Hey," I said, not looking at the oversized predatory wereduck, as it could perhaps be described.

"Sorry for dragging you away from your companions, but you needed help and we had no time. Have you arranged a meeting place?" he said, voice still reminding me of a bad broadcast of the news watched from a cottage in rural Alaska, but if the voice was weird, the things he had said were even weirder. Is he speaking in code? Is he brain-damaged? Am I?

"Sorry, I've no idea what you're talking about, Donald," I said, actually turning to look at him now. His eyes were actually softer to look at when he stopped having the angry grimace he had had constantly up until this point. They were surprisingly big.

"The attack on the prison, bypassing the defenses, it must have been done to free someone. The chaos allowed us to escape as well. You were badly wounded, so I brought you on board, and you once again helped out by piloting the ship after the crew tried to capture us instead of doing what we told them. I'm thankful," he said, and I was a bit surprised to hear what to me looked like a feral duck that had been fed to many cheeseburgers be so eloquent and polite.

"It did take you a long time to listen to my instructions, though. Unsure why you refused to do as I said, but I suppose it worked out," he said as an afterthought.

I shook my head, baffled as if my grandmother had slapped me across my face. "Wow, sorry, Howard, nothing of the sort went down. First of all, I couldn't understand what you said, it was first when I boarded here that Ghizzo here sprayed me with that wonder dust," I said, and as I said it I also felt the slight migraine still hanging in there from when I got dosed. I continued: "Also, I had no intention of crashing into anything anywhere, fuck me, that entire thing was just an accident."

He looked up at me, his large eyes and beak making for a funny combination of facial expressions, and said: "Accident? You got through the defenses of the Kuutellar belt by accident?" What I saw his face morph into I hoped was either deference or laughter. "And you are a primitive? Yet you still managed to control the ship we took? Well, mostly control," he said with a sound of a duck chuckling, which I had previously never considered what it would sound like.

I figured I might as well let the guy be impressed by my deeds and instead said: "We were doing a maiden flight of a new technology. It was supposed to move me at about a quarter light speed and stopping without turning me into oatmeal from the pressure. Oh, on that topic..." I turned to the large monitor on the wall, which in hindsight seemed silly since I don't think Ghizzo has a position as such on the ship, and said: "Ghizzo, where am I? How far from Earth?"

A normal-sized green square mouth appeared about two feet in front of where I was looking, and it was surrounded by navigational star charts. "Earth is in slice 186 and layer nineteen. I could give ya the more exact degrees, if ya want," Ghizzo said, and various arrows and circles appeared around an otherwise completely nondescript fleck of a part of one map. "It'd take ya a couple of years to go there on most ships, 'boutta dozen if you go by cargos," Ghizzo said, and at the same time the maps disappeared and technical documents appeared in their place. It continued: "But sounds to me ya invented Snapping. Without contact with the Jiktars. That an impressive civilization."

"Snapping?" I said, trying to understand a single word of any of the images Ghizzo was flashing.

"Jiktars technology," Ghizzo said. "Pulls together two spaces far apart. Ya make tiny move, ya are now in the new place. Then everything snap back to normal. Is extremely controlled, only used by Jiktart, yano." Ghizzo had transformed the previously technical documents with stuff that looked more like a commercial, showing flashy images of ships disappearing from one location and then on a star map how far they had traveled.

I didn't like being this uninitiated, and also it usually wasn't like me to be curious like a hippie in a meth lab, but there was suddenly a lot of stuff that might be really important to know. I said: "Who are these Jiktart dudes? You talk about them a lot."

"They try to control the entire galaxy," the beaked creature said from behind me. "And they're not very bothered with what it costs others." The look on the creature's face immediately told me to never fuck with this bird over these matters. A fury that has fermented for years or decades, if anger was a spirit this duck was straight whiskey.

Ghizzo was unphased. It blew up propaganda posters worthy of the greatest of Earth's dictators and said: "Jiktart the current largest faction within the galaxy. They invented Snapping to send fleets to every spot. Then emerged colonies, trading outposts, military bases, prisons, everything else Jiktart wanted. Ya not want Jiktart to be ya enemy."

"Yet you have commandeered one of their ships," I said and gestured around me.

Ghizzo but laughed and said: "I not ya."

But a thought struck me. "Ghizzo, can this ship Snap? Can you-" I said, but Ghizzo turned into a large X in the air.

space

"Not. Stealth model. Moves covertly. If want Snapping, need aggressive military ship," it said.

I needed only the briefest moments of contemplation to know what I needed to do, akin to a Buddha looking at a flower. I said: "If I get you into one of those, will you get me home?"

Ghizzo enlarged its mouth so that the smile could be even bigger.

"Of course, good friend."

I am slightly terrified that the beaked creature's feet sound like claws more than webbed toes, it didn't need any more predator traits.

After Ghizzo told me about the Jiktart, both the creature and I decided to head back to our quarters. Or, well, he to his and I am apparently free to pick whatever room I want.

"Shoot, Scrooge, I've forgotten to ask your name," I said after the silence had gotten awkward enough.

The beaked creature lifted, well, the muscle that usually would have an eyebrow on it, which it didn't have, but the muscle was instead three times as large as on a human, and said: "You seem otherwise to have a lot of names for me. I am Wyzzf, I stem from the planet we call 'Appisa', which to us means 'the water of life'. I neither know nor care where it lies in the Jiktart's books."

"And, are you..." I said, paused, hesitated a bit and then continued: "You called me 'primitive'. Is your planet very advanced?"

Again the buzz saw. "You misunderstand. 'Primitive' is anyone who is not in the commsfield, and thus can't communicate with others. It is really a Jiktart term, since it describes those who are not at a level where they want to speak with them. I suppose..." Wyzzf said, apparently swallowing some of his pride as the sentence went along, "I suppose the commsfield is a very useful invention of the Jiktart."

He grimaced a bit and then said: "Our planet was not highly technological. We didn't have weapons that could kill millions, ships that could haul an entire populace from one planet to the next, stations that mine out asteroids for ice and metals. But it was a good place with good people. I traveled a lot on my home planet, and every time I met another of us, I was met with friendship and love."

"That's a lot of past tense, buddy," I said. "Did you adapt all the Jiktart technology now?"

"No," he said. He stopped and looked into my eyes with that same fury just beneath the surface. "We do not have a planet anymore."

He turned around and went into the door behind him to his room. It closed with a comfortable thud, like falling back into a newly made bed.

"Damn, these dudes don't mind spending for comfort," I said as I looked around the room. I had asked Ghizzo, who could be reached anywhere on the ship at any time by just mentioning its name, to give me the most luxurious room, and he brought me to what must have been the room for the most VIP of guests. Not only was it big enough you could almost jump and not reach the floor with your fingers, it had a large, soft bed, a large mirror surrounded by closets and drawers, what I intuited to be a mini-bar and almost the entire wall was a window towards space. I was in luck and it happened to be facing the center of the galaxy, and the display was mesmerizing. One of my favorite memories is when I was younger and biked across almost all of Australia with my girl of the time. We spent three months doing nothing but riding the motorcycle, a beautiful MSF-1200 KsA, eating delicious local food, all the flavors you wouldn't find back home, and fucking like rabbits out in the wild, as was appropriate. I went up to the mini-bar, asked Ghizzo if these were drinkable, to which it answered yes. I took a shot and it was like my tongue was a freshly laid asphalt road and the drink was youngster with a sports car who couldn't wait to make the first burnout tracks on it, and once it passed the throat, I was sure I had swallowed a furiously running engine by mistake, burning and pulsing and spewing fumes up my throat that I had to meekly cough away. I had to lay down on my bed to get through it.

"I gotta bring a bottle of that back home," I finally managed to croak out with glistening eyes once the worst pain had dissipated.

After catching my breath again, I got curious about these robot parts I now have. I tried to do a pistol squat on the metallic leg, and perhaps as expected, it had no issues at all. I could be carrying two families on my back and hopping on this one leg across a mountainous border and it would probably feel like a mild hike. I looked around for something to hang on to, and picked something that stuck out from the ceiling I hoped could carry my weight, and the hand had not the gall to disappoint me, I could support my entire weight with only a single finger. I just had to remember to ask Ghizzo if I could get these painted like the rest of my body, but I didn't feel like bothering with that now.

I collapsed onto my bed. And about two seconds later, it hit me.

"I'm not tired but I am restless."

When I trained to become an astronaut, I spent a lot of time in space stations. They didn't have artificial gravity nearly as good as this ship, you still felt basically like a balloon bouncing around there, while I can barely tell this ship is not an actual boat on the ocean, sans the movement of the waves. We also had a relentless sleep schedule, since space never provided much of a natural cycle. But we never had private rooms, size was almost the primary concern of all space craft, and you were both often hunched over but also everyone usually slept in the same few rooms. A private room you can exercise in...? I'm not complaining, it's just more of a cruiser ship than a space one.

I opened the door and went out into the corridor. They were less extravagant and more pragmatic, but still larger than most connecting tunnels I was used to. I wandered around mostly at random, sometimes thinking I could ask Ghizzo for a map, but I had time to kill and two flasks I brought from the minibar that tasted unlike anything I've had on Earth but would easily be my favorite beer at my favorite bar back home.

As I wander to the back of the ship, the dark gray man is standing there leaning against a wall. I briefly wonder why, but it's company and these bottles won't drink themselves.

"Hi there, chief," I said from a still comfortable distance. With one of these people being smoldering with hatred, I might as well not invade someone's personal space too quickly.

The being looked up. I hadn't looked closely at it until now, but the face seemed made to make that smile menacing. It looked like the entire face was being pulled back from the mouth, like some fucked up horror movie, but it didn't move like soft flesh. I almost wanted to reach out and touch it, if it really had what was more correctly called a bone mask than a face. The rest of its body, as much as could be seen beneath the tattered pieces it had hanging from it here and there, seemed to follow about the same pattern of having almost a kind of exoskeleton. He gave me a great wide smile, and while I couldn't be sure if his eyes could be more comforting, they sure weren't anything but the most conniving and menacing slits now.

"Pleased to make your acquaintance, after you so bravely ended our captivity," he said, his politeness only making the rest of him seem even more intimidating.

"No, I didn't..." I started saying, but I didn't get time to finish before he starting to softly laugh at what he said, but even his soft laughter was more akin to hearing knives being sharpened than any kind of tension reliever.

"I am aware. A curious incident," he said.

"How did you know?" I said.

"Are you aware that you look superficially as one of the Jiktars?" he said, and got up from leaning on the wall. He wasn't just tall, his body somehow wrapped around the space in front of it. Standing in front of him made you feel surrounded. "And movement of the ship could only be explained by utilizing Snapping, a technology of the Jiktars." Fucker was seizing me up. He was walking in a circle around me. "Yet you aimed at nothing, and opened cells up only by the graces of good luck. A suicide operation with an expensive ship and no support afterwards?" He stopped in front of me. "The remains of the ship did not look like the pride of the Jiktars fleet. Nor did you, on a closer inspection," he said and leaned in slightly over me. I didn't want to admit it, but I was getting cold sweats and a raised pulse from his presence. I have stood in front of angry bikers and jealous kick boxers, but this creature made my skin crawl. You could see how he carefully bounced the next word around in his mouth before he spoke. "Are you going to drink both of those by yourself?"

He pulled back and sat down on a pragmatic bench. I remembered the second flask I bought, sat down next to him, held the bottle up to him and said: "No, man, go ahead."

He looked at it and then at me and said: "Could you kindly open it for me?" He nodded towards his hands. The shackle, if one can even call it that, was massive. A large cylinder, spanning from the middle of his hands up to his elbows, both keeping his hands stuck in a particular angle and also holding them apart so he could just barely get his fingertips together. I popped open the bottle and handed it to him, and even if he tried hiding it, it was obvious just how heavy and tiresome it was for him to lift a bottle to his lips and drink. Should have brought a straw, you know. "Cheers," I said and clinked the bottles together.

"It has been a very long time since I last shared a drink with a friend," he said, "If you would allow me to call you that."

And while I'm not in the habit of making friends with komodo dragons, I also try not to piss them off. "Sure, why not. Name's Rito," I said.

"My name is Irdd. I have spent many years stuck on that asteroid, and although it might not have been your intention, your actions allowed me my freedom," he said.

I lightly tapped the cylinder with my bottle. "Not fully, I'd say. How come you're the only one in irons?" I said with a perhaps slightly to jovial tone.

His expression didn't change at all. "The wardens preferred to stay alive," he said and took a laborious deep sip.

I laughed. I had to assume he meant it, that he would kill everyone in the entire prison were he just given use of his hands. He sure made me feel like that was true. I finished off the bottle and said: "So why don't you take it off?"

He strained his arms to lift up the cylinder and said: "The alloy it is made from is nearly impossible for most materials to dent. You could not open this with most regular tools without risking my life. Where the situation dire enough that I..." he let it drop and looked at me, "... or my friends would need it, then that risk might be appropriate." He finished his drink with some effort and said: "Under the current circumstances, I wonder if I will be allowed to prolong this state, however."

"How so?" I said.

He looked out into the empty air of the corridor and said: "Ghizzo, you are not capable of breaking this shackle." Ghizzo appeared in the form of some kind of hypercube, and with every sound wave it vibrated another cube within it so you could see the outlines of it.

"Right. We try everything on board, but nothing work," it said.

"And until it is, it will be an arduous struggle for me to repay what you want from me," Irdd said.

"I want ya to pay ya fare. You head has certain price all by itself. I can use that," Ghizzo said with a tone I couldn't decide was lackadaisical or threatening.

Irdd lowered his head slightly, but not a single atom of him was willing to give up his innate intimidation. "Oh my," he said in low and slow voice, "let us all hope it does not come to that."

The cube that Ghizzo projected spun around wildly before disappearing. I almost wish it made a sound like in cartoons so I could tell when it suddenly left.

"I will be returning to my quarters. I hope you will continue to enjoy the rest of your day," Irdd said.

"G'night buddy," I said and took the empty bottle from his hands.

I walked back to my room, and I have no idea if these drinks contained alcohol or not, but I did have a slightly buzzy feeling that made it much easier to sleep.
